NEW QUESTION # 204

An online betting site accepts bets for sporting events held around the world. Due to this, their operations need to be up 24x7. During an internal IT audit, they discovered a vulnerability in their payment gateway system. They assessed that should the payment gateway go down for more than an hour, they will lose about $100,000 and about 15% of their customers to their competitor website. Moreover, they might lose 25% of their customer base permanently due to the constant promotions run by their competitor to attract and retain new customers. This was unacceptable for the business under any circumstances, so immediate corrective measures were taken to fix the vulnerability. What technical term best defines this time period of two hours?

- A. Recovery Time Objective (RTO)
- B. Maximum Tolerable Period of Disruption (MTPOD)
- C. Work Recovery Time (WRT)
- D. Recovery Point Objective (RPO)

Answer: A

Explanation:

Recovery Time Objective (RTO) refers to the amount of time a system, application, or process can be down before it causes significant harm to the business. In this scenario, the betting site determined that if the payment gateway system is down for more than an hour, it would result in substantial financial losses ($100,000) and customer attrition (15% short-term and 25% permanently). The focus on the acceptable downtime before these impacts occur aligns with the definition of RTO. The mention of "two hours" in the question seems to be a slight mismatch with the "more than an hour" in the description, but the context still points to RTO as the best fit, as it defines the target time frame for recovery.

* Recovery Point Objective (RPO) refers to the amount of data loss (measured in time) a business can tolerate, not the duration of system downtime.

* Maximum Tolerable Period of Disruption (MTPOD) is a broader term that encompasses the total time a business can withstand a disruption, including recovery and other factors, but it is less specific to the immediate system restoration time frame described here.

* Work Recovery Time (WRT) is not a widely standardized term in this context and typically relates to the time needed to recover specific work processes, not the system downtime tolerance.

Thus, RTO is the most precise term for the time period the business can tolerate the payment gateway being unavailable.
