NEW QUESTION # 132

How can internal logging levels in a Splunk environment be changed to troubleshoot an issue? (select all that apply)

- A. Use Splunk command line.
- B. Edit log-local.cfg.
- C. Use the Monitoring Console (MC).
- D. Use Splunk Web.

Answer: A,B,C,D

Explanation:

Splunk provides various methods to change the internal logging levels in a Splunk environment to troubleshoot an issue. All of the options are valid ways to do so. Option A is correct because the Monitoring Console (MC) allows the administrator to view and modify the logging levels of various Splunk components through a graphical interface. Option B is correct because the Splunk command line provides the splunk set log-level command to change the logging levels of specific components or categories. Option C is correct because the Splunk Web provides the Settings > Server settings > Server logging page to change the logging levels of various components through a web interface. Option D is correct because the log-local.cfg file allows the administrator to manually edit the logging levels of various components by overriding the default settings in the log.cfg file
