- B. RBI
- C. Pha

Answer: B

NEW QUESTION # 69

Risk reduction is typically accomplished using:

- A. results of inspection activities
- B. mitigation activities
- C. equipment history review
- D. changing fluid characteristics
- E. process control

Answer: B

Explanation:

According to API 580, risk reduction is primarily achieved through implementing mitigation activities that are designed to lower either the probability of failure (PoF), the consequence of failure (CoF), or both.

As stated in Section 10.1:

"Risk can be reduced by reducing the likelihood (probability) of failure, the consequence of failure, or both.

This is typically accomplished through mitigation activities such as inspection, process control, or equipment modification." This clearly confirms that "mitigation activities" is the most direct and encompassing method of achieving risk reduction in an RBI program. While the other options (like process control or inspection activities) may be forms of mitigation, they fall under the broader category of mitigation activities and are not the definitive general method.

RBI plans identify equipment that does not require inspection or some other form of mitigation because of the acceptable level of risk associated with the equipment's current operation. In this way, inspection and maintenance activities can be:

- A. eliminated for all low consequence equipment.
- B. shifted to more profitable needs in the plant.
- C. more focused and cost effective.
- D. conducted while the equipment is on-line instead of during turnarounds.

Answer: C

Explanation:

As stated in API 580, Introduction (page xi):

"The RBI plans also identify equipment that does not require inspection or some other form of mitigation because of the acceptable level of risk associated with the equipment's current operation. In this way, inspection and maintenance activities can be focused and more cost-effective." Options B, C, and D introduce concepts not aligned with the API definition. Option A correctly captures the intent and benefit of an RBI-based plan.
