NEW QUESTION # 57
In an iterative lifecycle, in which stage are the solution requirements explored and defined?

- A. Establish solution backlog
- B. Establish business need and evaluate options
- C. Develop solution
- D. Plan solution increment

Answer: C

Explanation:
In an iterative or Agile lifecycle, requirements are not defined entirely upfront but are explored and refined just-in-time, immediately prior to implementation. The stage where the detailed solution requirements (functional and non-functional) are elaborated, modeled, and defined-ready for construction-is the Develop solution stage (often referred to as the Implementation or Construction phase of an iteration/sprint). The detailed work of defining, modelling, and validating the specific requirements happens as a preparatory step for the actual build, distinguishing it from the preceding planning phase (C) or the upstream strategic work (A, B).

NEW QUESTION # 61
In the lifecycle for a business case, what precedes the initial business case?

- A. Solution development and implementation
- B. Feasibility study
- C. Requirements analysis and specification
- D. Solution design

Answer: B

Explanation:
The development of a Business Case is often an iterative process. Before significant investment is made in creating the detailed Initial Business Case (often called the Outline Business Case or OBC), a preliminary assessment is required to ensure the proposed change is viable. This assessment is the Feasibility study (or Feasibility Assessment). A feasibility study quickly evaluates the proposed initiative to confirm it is technically possible, financially justifiable, and strategically aligned (Business Feasibility). The outcomes of this study determine whether it is worthwhile to proceed to the more detailed, full business case development. The other options (A, B, D) occur after the initial business case is approved and investment is committed.
