NEW QUESTION # 60

An architect is responsible for designing a VMware Cloud Foundation (VCF)-based private cloud for a customer. During the customer requirements gathering workshop, the customer has stated the following:

- * All Platinum applications/services must have an availability SLA of 99.99%.
- * All Gold applications/services must have an availability SLA of 99.9%.
- * All Silver applications/services must have an availability SLA of 99%.
- * The private cloud must have an availability SLA of 99.9%.

What should the architect recommend to meet the stated requirements?

- A. The Platinum service availability requirements must be met by the application.
- B. The private cloud SLA can only be met using multiple VMware Cloud Foundation instances configured as a single VCF Fleet.
- C. The Platinum service availability requirements must be met by configuring Proactive High Availability (HA) on the workload domain.
- D. The private cloud must only be used to host Silver and Gold services.

Answer: A

Explanation:

The overall private cloud SLA is 99.9%, but Platinum applications require 99.99%, which exceeds the infrastructure SLA. VMware design methodology states:

- * If an application's SLA is higher than the infrastructure SLA, then the application itself must provide the additional resilience (e.g., clustering, active-active deployment, or application-level HA).
- * Options A and B reduce flexibility or impose unnecessary complexity.
- * Option D (Proactive HA) improves resiliency but cannot guarantee 99.99%, since Proactive HA still depends on underlying infrastructure SLA.

Therefore, the only valid recommendation is that Platinum workloads must implement resilience at the application layer.
