Which three building blocks are used to create a Flow?

- A. Screens
- B. Process
- C. Resources
- D. Connectors
- E. Elements

Answer: C,D,E

Explanation:
There are 3 main "building blocks" of any Flow:
1. Elements are the individual building blocks of the Flow. These perform logical actions such as assignments, decisions, or loops. There are also data elements that will query the database or commit record changes.
2. Connectors determine which element leads to which. Winter '21 enables Auto-Layout, and connects the Elements together automatically.
3. Resources are the individual variables of data that are to be used in a Flow - these can be strings of text, numbers, records, formulae, or collections.

NEW QUESTION # 48
What can a record variable store?

- A. A set of field values for a single record.
- B. A set of field values for a single record that are not marked as Global.
- C. A set of field values of multiple records that have the same object type.
- D. A set of field values of multiple records that have multiple object types.

Answer: A

Explanation:
A record variable in Salesforce Flow is used to store a set of field values for a single Salesforce record. This allows the flow to manipulate data for that record, such as retrieving data from the record or updating the record with new values. Record variables are specific to one object type and facilitate the handling of individual records within a flow.Reference: Salesforce Help - Work with Record Variables in Flow
