- A. Installing a fire suppression system in a data center
- B. Classifying an information system as part of a document assessment
- C. Establishing procurement guidelines for vendors
- D. Conducting weekly audits of configuration management processes

Answer: D

Explanation:

Comprehensive and Detailed Explanation (250-350 words)

According to EC-Council CCISO documentation, operational controls are controls executed by people and processes as part of day-to-day operations to ensure security objectives are met. Conducting weekly audits of configuration management processes is an example of an operational control because it involves recurring human-driven activities designed to maintain system integrity and compliance.

CCISO materials categorize controls into administrative (management), operational, technical, and physical.

Operational controls include procedures such as monitoring, reviews, audits, incident handling, and change verification-activities performed regularly to support security operations.

Establishing procurement guidelines (Option B) is an administrative/management control. Classifying an information system (Option C) is a governance and documentation activity, also administrative. Installing a fire suppression system (Option D) is a physical control.

The CCISO program stresses that CISOs must ensure operational controls are effective because they directly influence how policies and standards are enforced in practice.

Therefore, Option A is correct.
