NEW QUESTION # 98

A threat hunter uses Cisco Secure Network Analytics (Stealthwatch) to identify potential command-and-control traffic. Which characteristic MOST strongly indicates beaconing behavior?

- A. High-volume inbound traffic from the internet
- B. Small, periodic outbound connections to a rare destination
- C. Irregular outbound connections over multiple protocols
- D. Large file transfers to external IP addresses

Answer: B

Explanation:

The correct answer is small, periodic outbound connections to a rare destination. Beaconing is a hallmark of command-and-control (C2) communication, particularly in stealthy malware campaigns.

Attackers design C2 channels to:

- * Minimize bandwidth usage
- * Blend into normal traffic
- * Avoid triggering threshold-based alerts

As a result, beaconing traffic often consists of low-volume, regular intervals connecting to the same external destination. Cisco Secure Network Analytics is purpose-built to detect this type of behavioral anomaly using NetFlow and telemetry analysis.

Option A suggests data exfiltration rather than beaconing. Option B is too broad and unspecific. Option D relates to denial-of-service or scanning activity, not C2.

This hunting technique aligns with MITRE ATT&CK - Command and Control and is explicitly covered in the CBRTHD blueprint under network-based threat hunting. Detecting beaconing behavior forces attackers to significantly alter their communication strategy, increasing their operational cost.

Therefore, Option C is the correct and Cisco-aligned answer.
