NEW QUESTION # 256

Paul is the business analyst for his organization. He is examining a single solution to determine if the solution he and his team have identified carries enough business value to justify its implementation.

What business analysis process is Paul performing in this scenario?

- A. Allocate requirements
- B. Assess proposed solution
- C. Assess organizational readiness
- D. Define transition requirements

Answer: B

Explanation:

According to the BABOK Guide, the purpose of the Assess Proposed Solution task is to determine how well a proposed solution meets the business need and to identify any gaps, risks, or shortcomings before committing resources to its implementation. This task involves evaluating the solution against the requirements, the solution scope, and the solution acceptance criteria. Paul is performing this task by examining a single solution to determine its business value and feasibility. NEW QUESTION # 257

Your organization completes software development for other companies as its core business. Management would like to streamline the requirements gathering processes as many of the projects your company do are similar in nature.

What approach could you as a business analyst do to help streamline the requirements gathering process for your organization?

- A. Implement scope solution models
- B. Implement a requirements gathering form
- C. Implement a requirements re-use repository
- D. Implement project template

Answer: C

Explanation:

A requirements re-use repository is a collection of reusable requirements that can be applied to similar projects or products. It can help streamline the requirements gathering process by reducing the effort and time needed to elicit, analyze, and document requirements. It can also improve the quality and consistency of requirements by leveraging best practices and lessons learned from previous projects. A requirements re-use repository can also facilitate traceability, change management, and communication among stakeholders.

B: Implementing project templates is not the best answer because project templates are more related to project management than requirements gathering. Project templates can help standardize the project planning and execution processes, but they do not necessarily address the specific requirements of each project or product.

C: Implementing a requirements gathering form is not the best answer because a requirements gathering form is a tool for capturing and documenting requirements, not for streamlining the requirements gathering process.

A requirements gathering form can help structure and organize the requirements, but it does not reduce the effort and time needed to elicit, analyze, and document requirements.

D: Implementing scope solution models is not the best answer because scope solution models are used to define and communicate the boundaries and features of a solution, not to streamline the requirements gathering process. Scope solution models can help clarify and validate the solution scope, but they do not reduce the effort and time needed to elicit, analyze, and document requirements. References:

Requirements elicitation is not a business analysis planning and monitoring approach, but a business analysis task that involves identifying and documenting the needs and expectations of stakeholders. Business analysis planning and monitoring is the knowledge area that covers the tasks of defining the business analysis approach, planning the business analysis activities, managing the business analysis performance, and communicating the business analysis information. The other three options are examples of techniques that can be used in business analysis planning and monitoring, such as structured walkthroughs for validating the business analysis approach, decision analysis for selecting the best solution option, and process modeling for defining the business analysis process.
