The type of electric locking device that permits free mechanical egress from the protected side of the door is the:

- A. Electric strike
- B. Electromagnetic
- C. Delayed egress
- D. Vertical pin

Answer: A

Explanation:
An electric strike allows for remote electrical locking and unlocking while still permitting free mechanical egress from the protected (inside) side of the door. This is essential for life safety and code compliance, especially in commercial and public buildings.
A (Vertical pin) is a mechanical lock component, not an electric device.
B (Electromagnetic) locks typically require power to release and may not allow mechanical egress without integration.
D (Delayed egress) restricts exit temporarily, which may violate free egress rules depending on application.

- A. Transmitting and receiving infrared radiation, then detecting any changes in signals
- B. Detecting infrared radiation and analyzing the reflection data
- C. Detecting moving infrared radiation against the radiation environment of the room
- D. Transmitting infrared radiation into the environment of the room and detecting the changes

Answer: C

Explanation:
Passive Infrared (PIR) sensors operate by detecting changes in infrared radiation (heat) levels in a given area.
They do not emit any energy but instead sense the movement of heat signatures (typically from people) across a background that has a stable infrared profile. When a warm object moves in front of the sensor, it registers a change and triggers an alert.
B and C describe active sensors (e.g., microwave or ultrasonic).
D refers to analyzing reflected infrared, which is not how PIR sensors function.
