NEW QUESTION # 127
When configuring a change set, which two practices should an administrator adhere to in order to ensure a successful deployment to production?
Choose 2 answers

- A. Add permissions and access settings to outbound change sets in addition to the dependent component list.
- B. When deploying a new record type, ensure the new record type is the only component in the change set.
- C. Run deployment validations on the change set in the sandbox prior to uploading to production.
- D. Clone a change set to add forgotten dependent components to an uploaded change set.

Answer: A,C

Explanation:
Two practices that the administrator should adhere to in order to ensure a successful deployment to production are:
* Add permissions and access settings to outbound change sets in addition to the dependent component list. This can help avoid deployment errors or access issues caused by missing permissions or settings for the components in the change set. For example, if the change set includes a new custom object, the administrator should also include the object permissions, field-level security, page layouts, and record types for that object.
* Run deployment validations on the change set in the sandbox prior to uploading to production. This can help test the change set for any errors or conflicts before deploying it to production. Deployment validations simulate the deployment without actually making any changes and report any issues or warnings.

The other two options are incorrect because:

* Cloning a change set does not add forgotten dependent components to an uploaded change set. It only creates a copy of the existing change set that can be modified before uploading.

* When deploying a new record type, it is not necessary to have it as the only component in the change set. It can be deployed along with other components as long as they are compatible and have the required dependencies.
