NEW QUESTION # 889

A team is entering into a forming stage after kickoff, with project objectives identified and team members assigned with roles and responsibilities. However, during the team meetings, a team member does not agree on project documents and makes comments that could affect the performance of other team members.

What should the project manager do?

- A. Escalate the team member's disruptive behavior to their functional manager.
- B. Request team members document their decisions independently and share with each other.
- C. Observe to ensure this typical forming stage behavior does not escalate beyond what is acceptable.
- D. Collaborate with the team to arrive at team ground rules and publish the rules to the team.

Answer: D

Explanation:

During the forming stage of team development, it is common for team members to be polite and avoid conflict, but disagreements can still occur. Establishing team ground rules is a proactive approach to prevent conflicts and ensure that all team members are on the same page. This strategy aligns with the PMBOK Guide's emphasis on collaboration and team engagement as key components of project management. By collaborating on ground rules, the team can address disagreements in a structured manner and support a positive team environment, which is crucial for the subsequent stages of team development.
