NEW QUESTION # 11

When working with a long-running workflow involving form actions in Action Center, how is the job resumed after it has been suspended?

- A. The job resumes only after the assigned user completes the form action.
- B. The job resumes automatically after 30 minutes if the form action is not completed.
- C. The job resumes immediately when the form action is created, without waiting for completion.
- D. The job resumes when any user with View permissions on Actions approves the form.

Answer: A

Explanation:

In long-running workflows, when a form action is sent to Action Center, the job is suspended until the form is completed by the assigned user. Only upon completion of the action does the job resume execution. This ensures that business-critical human validation is accounted for before the process continues.

- A. Solution package
- B. Environment-specific configuration file
- C. Process execution set
- D. Orchestrator bundle

NEW QUESTION # 13

In the Global Exception Handler, which arguments are provided by default and should not be removed?

- A. errorinfo with the "Out" direction result with the "In/Out" direction
- B. errorinfo with the "In" direction result with the "In" direction
- C. errorinfo with the "In" direction result with the "In/Out" direction
- D. errorinfo with the "In" direction result with the "Out" direction

Answer: D

Explanation:

The Global Exception Handler is a type of workflow that determines the project's behavior when encountering an execution error. It has two arguments that are provided by default and should not be removed. They are:

* errorinfo: This argument has the "In" direction and it stores information about the error that was thrown and the workflow that failed. It can be used to log the error details, get the name of the activity that caused the error, or count the number of retries1.

* result: This argument has the "Out" direction and it is used to specify the next action of the process when it encounters an error. It can have one of the following values: Continue, Ignore, Retry, or Abort. These values determine whether the exception is re-thrown, ignored, retried, or stops the execution1.

The other options are not correct, because they either have the wrong direction for the arguments, or they use the "In/Out" direction, which is not valid for the Global Exception Handler arguments1.

NEW QUESTION # 14

How can a process be converted from a foreground process to a background process?

- A. A process may be turned into a Background Process by just deleting the UiAutomation package dependency as long as it does/does not contain UI interaction
- B. A process may be turned into a Background Process as long as it does not contain persistence activities. You need to go to the Project Settings window and set the Supports Persistence toggle to No.
- C. A process may be turned into a Background Process by adding a "Background" tag to the process name as long as it does/does not contain UI interaction. You need to go to the Project Settings and modify the name of the process.
- D. A process may be turned into a Background Process as long as it does not contain activities with UI interaction. You need to go to the Project Settings window and set the Starts in Background toggle to Yes.

Answer: D

Explanation:

Converting a process into a background process in UiPath is accomplished by ensuring the process does not contain UI interaction and setting the "Starts in Background" toggle to Yes in the Project Settings. This is crucial for processes meant to run without user interface interaction.
