NEW QUESTION # 504

The FIRST step in auditing a data communication system is to determine:

- A. physical security for network equipment
- B. the level of redundancy in the various communication paths
- C. traffic volumes and response-time criteria
- D. business use and types of messages to be transmitted

Answer: D

Explanation:

The first step in auditing a data communication system is to determine the business use and types of messages to be transmitted. This is because the auditor needs to understand the purpose, scope, and objectives of the data communication system, as well as the nature, volume, and sensitivity of the data being transmitted. This will help the auditor to identify the risks, controls, and audit criteria for the data communication system. Traffic volumes and response-time criteria, physical security for network equipment, and the level of redundancy in the various communication paths are important aspects of a data communication system, but they are not the first step in auditing it. They depend on the business use and types of messages to be transmitted, and they may vary according to different scenarios and requirements.
