The primary purpose of implementing supplier relationship management (SRM) is to:

- A. enable sole or single sourcing.
- B. minimize legal contracts.
- C. Identity strategic sources of supply.
- D. streamline the procurement process.

Answer: C

Explanation:

The primary purpose of implementing supplier relationship management (SRM) is to identify strategic sources of supply. SRM is the process of managing supplier relationships in order to ensure that products and services are delivered on time, within budget, and with the required quality¹. SRM provides a foundation for effective supplier management and helps ensure that suppliers meet customer expectations. One of the main objectives of SRM is to identify strategic sources of supply, which are the suppliers that provide the most value, innovation, and competitive advantage to the organization². By identifying strategic sources of supply, an organization can focus its resources and efforts on developing and maintaining long-term, collaborative, and mutually beneficial relationships with these suppliers^{3,4}. The other options are not as accurate or comprehensive as the correct answer. While SRM may also help minimize legal contracts, enable sole or single sourcing, and streamline the procurement process, these are not the primary or only purpose of SRM.

They are more specific outcomes or benefits of SRM, but they do not capture the essence of what SRM does for an organization. SRM is more than just a tool for reducing contracts, sourcing from one supplier, or simplifying the procurement process; it is a strategy for managing and enhancing supplier relationships^{1,2}.
