NEW QUESTION # 249

An administrator wants to back up a large file system with millions of files using either the NetBackup Accelerator feature or the NetBackup FlashBackup feature.

Which consideration is irrelevant when determining which feature to be used?

- A. the type of file system being used
- B. the file system storage capacity
- C. the file system change rate
- D. the file system folder depth

Answer: D

Explanation:

The irrelevant consideration is the file system folder depth. When selecting between NetBackup Accelerator and NetBackup FlashBackup for a file system containing millions of files, the key design factors are capacity, file-count/metadata handling, change processing, policy support, and file system/platform compatibility-not how deeply folders are nested. Cohesity documents that Accelerator performs an initial full backup and creates a track log, then identifies changed data by comparing track-log information against file-system information for each file; on NTFS/ReFS it can also use the Windows change journal. Cohesity also states that Accelerator track-log sizing is relative to file system size and number of backup files, with sizing formulas based on number of files and used disk space-not directory depth. FlashBackup is documented as combining raw-partition backup speed with individual file restore, and the FlashBackup/FlashBackup- Windows policy types are platform-specific, making the type of file system/client platform relevant. Storage capacity is also relevant because FlashBackup size reporting uses the mounted Windows disk volume or UNIX raw disk partition size. References/topics: Accelerator operation, track-log sizing, FlashBackup policy types, and large file-system backup planning.
