NEW QUESTION # 159

Daily coordination meeting attendance has been declining recently. Those who attend have little to contribute outside of what they are currently working on. The project manager met with the team to remind them of the importance of regular, face-to-face communication. The project team feels the daily coordination meetings are not adding value. What should the project manager do?

- A. Change the meeting to the end of the day ensure it lasts only 15 minutes and require all team members to attend.
- B. Reduce the occurrence of meetings because team members regularly communicate with the another and the customer
- C. Keep the meetings because some find them valuable and assume that those not attending are working steadily and have no blockers.
- D. Work with team members to create a wiki where they can record their current accomplishments.

Answer: B

Explanation:

If the team members are already communicating regularly with each other and the customer, the daily coordination meetings may not be necessary. The project manager should adapt to the team's needs by reducing the frequency of these meetings, allowing the team to focus more on delivering work. This approach supports Agile principles of minimizing waste and encouraging efficient communication, ensuring that meetings are only held when they add clear value. The team can use alternative methods (e.g., a digital board or asynchronous communication) to stay aligned.
