However, the company is planning to expand internationally by acquiring Company B, a distribution company in Country B, to enable it to sell goods worldwide. The functional currency of Country B is the B$. Company A will invoice its international customers in their local currency.

Wage increases in Country B are forecast to be modest, due to high unemployment levels, but overall inflation in Country B is forecast to be significantly higher than in Country A. Which TWO of the following statements about the economic risk of the acquisition of Company B are true?

- A. Economic risk can be eliminated by using forward contracts to convert future cash flows into A$
- B. Higher inflation will increase the project's B$ returns, so the economic risk can be ignored
- C. Financing this acquisition with block denominated in B$ will reduce economic risk.
- D. Exporting into a variety of international markets will reduce economic risk.
- E. Using purchasing power parity, A$ is forecast to strengthen against B$, so the economic risk can be ignored

Answer: C,D

Explanation:

A - B$ debt as a natural hedge: Borrowing in B$ to finance the B$ investment creates a natural hedge: B$ operating cash inflows help service B$ interest and principal. This reduces the net exposure of A$ shareholders to movements in the B$/A$ rate and so lowers economic risk.

D - Diversifying export markets: Selling into a variety of international markets spreads exposure across multiple economies and currencies, reducing dependence on any single one. This diversification reduces economic risk.

The other options are not true:

B: Forwards hedge specific transactions, not long-term economic risk.

C: Higher local inflation usually comes with currency depreciation and cost increases; economic risk cannot be ignored.

E: If A$ is expected to strengthen, that actually increases economic exposure to B$ earnings, it doesn't remove it.
