NEW QUESTION # 34

Which derivatives transaction has the greatest default risk?

- A. Interest rate forward agreement between an investment dealer and a corporation.
- B. Individual investor entering future contract with an institutional investor.
- C. Exchange-traded equity option contract between an individual investor and a dealer.
- D. Individual investor buying shares on an exchange during the ex-rights period.

Answer: A

Explanation:

An interest rate forward agreement (FRA) is an over-the-counter (OTC) derivative contract. Unlike exchange-traded derivatives, OTC contracts are not centrally cleared, meaning there is no intermediary to guarantee performance. This increases counterparty (default) risk, making FRAs inherently riskier than exchange-traded contracts.

* A. Individual investor buying shares on an exchange during the ex-rights period: This is a standard transaction involving equity securities, not derivatives, and carries no default risk.

* C. Exchange-traded equity option contract between an individual investor and a dealer: Exchange-traded derivatives are backed by a clearinghouse, which mitigates default risk.

* D. Individual investor entering a futures contract with an institutional investor: Futures contracts are also exchange-traded and centrally cleared, reducing default risk.

NEW QUESTION # 36

How do the fees differ between an F-class and front-end version of the same fund?

- A. The fees are identical
- B. The management expense ratio is lower on the F-class fund.
- C. The management expense ratio is higher on the F-class fund.
- D. The commission charged is higher on the F-class fund.

Answer: B

Explanation:

F-class funds are designed for fee-based accounts, where investors pay advisors a separate fee for services rather than a commission. This structure impacts the Management Expense Ratio (MER).

* Management Expense Ratio (MER):

* F-Class Funds: Exclude embedded advisor commissions, resulting in lower MER. These funds are cost-effective for investors in fee-based arrangements.

* Front-End Funds: Include advisor commissions as part of the MER, increasing overall costs.

* Fee Structure:

* F-class funds charge a flat management fee without embedded commissions, offering more transparency.

* Front-end funds involve a sales charge (front-end load) that compensates advisors directly at the time of purchase.

Key Differences Between F-Class and Front-End Funds Why A is Correct The lower MER of F-class funds reflects the absence of embedded advisor fees, making them more attractive to fee-conscious investors.
