NEW QUESTION # 114

Your company uses Teams Calling Plans.

When a user places a Teams call to an ambulance service, you need to ensure that a notification is also sent to the main receptionist of the company.

What should you configure?

- A. a calling policy
- B. a voice routing policy
- C. a caller ID policy
- D. an emergency calling policy

Answer: D

Explanation:

Explanation

you should configure an emergency calling policy to define what happens when a Teams user in your organization makes an emergency call. You can set who to notify and how they are notified when a user who is assigned the policy calls emergency services. For example, you can configure policy settings to automatically notify your organization's main receptionist and have them listen in emergency calls.

To create a custom emergency calling policy, you can follow these steps In the left navigation of the Microsoft Teams admin center, go to Voice > Emergency policies, and then click the Calling policies tab.

Click Add.

Enter a name and description for the policy.

Set how you want to notify people in your organization, typically the main receptionist, when an emergency call is made. To do this, under Notification mode, select one of the following:

Send notification only: A Teams chat message is sent to the users and groups that you specify.

Conferenced in but are muted: A Teams chat message is sent to the users and groups that you specify and they can listen (but not participate) in the conversation between the caller and the PSAP operator.

Conferenced in and are unmuted: A Teams chat message is sent to the users and groups that you specify and they can unmute to listen and participate in the conversation between the caller and the PSAP operator.

Set the Emergency service disclaimer to show a banner to remind your end users to confirm their emergency location.
