ASIS Certified Protection Professional Sample Questions (Q317-Q322):

NEW QUESTION # 317

Which method of wiretapping does not require a physical connection to a line?

- A. Hardwire connection
- B. Connective junctioning
- C. Active imaging
- D. Inductive coupling

Answer: D

Explanation:

Inductive coupling is a wiretapping method that intercepts data or voice communication without requiring a physical connection to the target line. Instead, it uses the electromagnetic field generated by the current flowing through a wire. This technique allows eavesdroppers to capture information covertly, making it a significant concern in secure communications.

* How It Works: Inductive coupling involves placing an induction device, such as a coil, near the communication line. The coil captures electromagnetic signals and converts them into data or audio that can be monitored or recorded.

* Countermeasures: To prevent such unauthorized interception, organizations use shielded cables, grounding, and electronic countermeasures to reduce electromagnetic emissions. Regularly inspecting sensitive communication lines for anomalies or devices can further mitigate this risk.

ASIS Certified Protection Professional (CPP) References:

* Technical Surveillance Countermeasures (TSCM): CPP materials emphasize the importance of shielding and monitoring against inductive coupling.

* Communications Security: Securing data transmission lines is a key focus in CPP modules on information security.
