There is 1 correct answers to this question.

- A. Key functionality and screen flow built with traditional materials
- B. Wire frames demonstrating the screen layout and field sizes
- C. Data model describing the required application programming interfaces
- D. Printout to finalized screenshots assembled in a flip-book.

Answer: B

Explanation:

Low-fidelity mock-ups are essential tools in SAP Design Thinking for quickly visualizing and testing software solutions without investing significant time or resources. Here's why the correct answer is D:

* Wireframes demonstrating the screen layout and field sizes (D): Wireframes are simple, visual representations of a software solution's interface, focusing on layout, navigation, and key elements like buttons and fields. SAP emphasizes that wireframes help teams explore and validate user interactions and workflows early in the design process.

Incorrect Options:

* A. Key functionality and screen flow built with traditional materials: While traditional materials (e.g., paper, sticky notes) can be used for prototyping, they do not specifically address the screen layout and field sizes critical to software solutions.

* B. Data model describing the required application programming interfaces: Data models and APIs are technical details that come later in development, not during low-fidelity prototyping.

* C. Printout to finalized screenshots assembled in a flip-book: Finalized screenshots imply a high-fidelity prototype, which is not characteristic of low-fidelity mock-ups.
