NEW QUESTION # 42
A client currently runs a Ruby script in a one-off dyno each time they deploy their Go application to Heroku.
The development team wants the script to be executed before the application is deployed because it performs necessary database migrations. Which approach should an Architect recommend?

- A. Convert the Ruby release script to Go and execute it on application startup
- B. Use both Go and Ruby language buildpacks, and run the Ruby script with release phase
- C. Define different process types for the Ruby script and the Go application in the app's Profile.
- D. Modify the Go buildpacK to install Ruby, and run the script from the _profile

Answer: B

Explanation:
- There are many scenarios in which a single buildpack is not sufficient when building an application. This includes cases when you need to: Run a buildpack for each language your app uses For example, run a JavaScript buildpack for assets and a Ruby buildpack for your application Run a daemon process such as pgbouncer with your application. Pull in system dependencies with apt. You can check the following for more information: https://devcenter heroku com/articles/using-multiple-buildpacks-for-an-app
