NEW QUESTION # 151

John Freeman developed a rule for fire hydrant spacing in compact mercantile and manufacturing districts of:

- A. 250 ft (76 m)
- B. 350 ft (107 m)
- C. 400 ft (122 m)
- D. 300 ft (91 m)

Answer: A

Explanation:

Engineering: Distribution, Network, Hydrant Spacing, Storage

Freeman noted a fundamental difference between systems designed to supply ordinary water needs and those for fire protection: Fire draft required concentration of the water, whereas domestic draft was a matter of distribution. Freeman asserted that, if a water system was to supply fire protection needs, the distribution system should be designed to concentrate the needed amounts of water. Small pipes were sufficient for distribution, but larger ones were needed to concentrate supply to fire streams. He suggested 6-in. (152-mm) diameter pipe as the minimum for residential district and note that 8-in. (203-mm) pipe was adequate only if it formed part of a network of distribution pipes whose intersections were not far apart. Another important point Freeman made was that hydrants should be placed where they could concentrate streams at specific blocks or groups of buildings rather than be placed arbitrarily a certain number of feet (m) apart on the street mains. His work on hose streams showed how long hose lines reduced the water that can be delivered promptly to a fire. Therefore, he suggest working rule for hydrant spacing of 250 ft (76 m) between hydrants in compact mercantile and manufacturing districts and 400 ft (122 m) to 500 ft (153 m) in residential districts. These working rules can still be used as guides for good design. Freeman further insisted that fire supply should be in addition to maximum domestic consumption, and he laid the foundation for the eventual recognition of this principle. He also calculated how much water should be stored in standpipes or in elevated reservoirs. He figured that flow for all of the hose streams required should be supplied from a reliable source, as an elevated storage reservoir, for at least 6 hr when the system was also furnishing maximum demands for domestic and other uses. He also calculated that to supply the combined fire and domestic needs in a system provided with reliable pump capacity a 1-hr supply in a standpipe or elevated reservoir would be acceptable.
