APICS Certified Supply Chain Professional Sample Questions (Q601-Q606):

NEW QUESTION # 601

A company that sells engineered-to-order products is planning implementation of a supplier relationship management system (SRM) for direct materials. Which of the following factors is most likely to make the implementation difficult?

- A. Cost of the application software upgrades
- B. Complexity of the purchasing process
- C. Management of variable lead times
- D. Resistance of material suppliers

Answer: B

Explanation:

For a company that sells engineered-to-order products, the complexity of the purchasing process is the factor most likely to make the implementation of a Supplier Relationship Management (SRM) system difficult.

Engineered-to-order products typically require customized components and materials, leading to a complex purchasing process involving multiple specifications, custom orders, and variable requirements. This complexity can challenge the standardization and integration capabilities of SRM systems, making implementation and ongoing management more difficult compared to more standardized purchasing processes.

NEW QUESTION # 602

SCOR applies to all of the following activities EXCEPT:

- A. all product transactions
- B. all customer interactions from order entry through paid invoice
- C. all market interactions from understanding aggregate demand through order fulfillment
- D. sales and marketing (defined as demand generation)

Answer: D

NEW QUESTION # 603

A company has adequate average available capacity but does not maintain surge capacity. With a distribution route to manage, which of the following actions will provide the most capacity relief?

- A. Increasing prices with a 30-day effective date
- B. Increasing product queue times
- C. Increasing order-fulfillment lead times
- D. Implementing allocation

Answer: C

Explanation:

When a company has adequate average available capacity but lacks surge capacity, increasing order- fulfillment lead times can provide the most capacity relief. By extending lead times, the company can spread out orders over a longer period, allowing for better resource allocation and reducing the pressure on production and distribution during peak times. This approach helps manage the flow of orders more effectively without requiring additional capacity or resources. Implementing allocation, increasing prices, or increasing product queue times may have some effects, but they do not directly address the issue of balancing capacity and demand as effectively as adjusting lead times.
