NEW QUESTION # 347

Which of these are defined by the following statement: a contract you have with your end custom-ers, which, if you don't meet, you might even have to pay fines?

- A. SLC - Service Level Contract
- B. SLA - Service Level Agreement
- C. SLO - Service Level Objective
- D. SLI - Service Level Indicator

Answer: B

Explanation:

Service-Level Agreement (SLA)

At Google, we distinguish between an SLO and a Service-Level Agreement (SLA). An SLA normally involves a promise to someone using your service that its availability SLO should meet a certain level over a certain period, and if it fails to do so then some kind of penalty will be paid. This might be a partial refund of the service subscription fee paid by customers for that period, or additional subscription time added for free. The concept is that going out of SLO is going to hurt the service team, so they will push hard to stay within SLO. If you're charging your customers money, you will probably need an SLA.

Because of this, and because of the principle that availability shouldn't be much better than the SLO, the availability SLO in the SLA is normally a looser objective than the internal availability SLO. This might be expressed in availability numbers: for instance, an availability SLO of 99.9% over one month, with an internal availability SLO of 99.95%. Alternatively, the SLA might only specify a subset of the metrics that make up the internal SLO.

- A. Artifact Registry and Cloud Storage
- B. Compute Engine and Filestore
- C. Pub/Sub and Cloud Storage
- D. Dataflow and BigQuery

Answer: B

Explanation:
Reference:

If you have virtual disks in your on-premises environment with software and configurations that you need (sometimes referred to as golden disks or golden images), you can save time by importing those virtual disks into Compute Engine and using the resulting image to create virtual machines. The import tool supports most virtual disk file formats, including VMDK and VHD.

If you exported your disk from Compute Engine, you can create images from the disk.

For information about how to create an automated system for migrating several virtual machines (VMs), see Migrating VMs to Compute Engine.
