APICS Certified in Planning and Inventory Management (CPIM 8.0) Sample Questions (Q104-Q109):

NEW QUESTION # 104

A company's primary performance objective is flexibility. Which of the following measurements is most important?

- A. Machine changeover time
- B. Schedule adherence
- C. Cycle time
- D. Labor productivity

Answer: A

Explanation:

Flexibility is the ability of a process or system to adapt to changes in customer demand, product mix, or production volume. A flexible process can respond quickly and efficiently to these changes, minimizing disruptions and costs. One of the key measurements of flexibility is machine changeover time, which is the time required to switch a machine or equipment from producing one type of product to another. A shorter machine changeover time means a higher level of flexibility, as the process can accommodate different products or orders without wasting time or resources. This aligns with CPIM's focus on plan, manage, and execute detailed schedules and manage quality, continuous improvement, and technology. References: The concepts are covered in detail in Module 5: Detailed Scheduling and Planning (1 and Module 6: Quality, Continuous Improvement, and Technology (2. You can also find more information about flexibility and machine changeover time from these sources: 3, 4, and 5.

- A. Incinerating
- B. Reformatting
- C. Erasing
- D. Degaussing

Answer: D

NEW QUESTION # 107

The master schedule is an important tool in the sales and operations planning (S&OP) process because it:

- A. represents the forecast with less detail.
- B. balances supply and demand at the product mix level.
- C. balances supply and demand at the sales volume level.
- D. represents the forecast before changes are made in S&OP.

Answer: B

Explanation:

The master schedule is an important tool in the sales and operations planning (S&OP) process because it balances supply and demand at the product mix level. The master schedule is a detailed plan that specifies the quantity and timing of each end item or product family to be produced. It is derived from the aggregate production plan, which is the output of the S&OP process. The master schedule helps to translate the aggregate plan into specific product requirements and to allocate the available capacity to meet the demand. The master schedule also provides input to the material requirements planning (MRP) and capacity requirements planning (CRP) systems, which further refine the production plan at the component and resource levels. The other statements are not true about the master schedule. The master schedule does not represent the forecast before changes are made in S&OP, as the forecast is an input to the S&OP process, not an output. The master schedule does not represent the forecast with less detail, as the master schedule is more detailed than the forecast, which is usually expressed in aggregate terms. The master schedule does not balance supply and demand at the sales volume level, as the sales volume level is the level of the aggregate production plan, not the master schedule.
