- A. They block until a response is returned from the servers.
- B. They add perceived latency to an application if data is not received.
- C. They do not block while waiting for the API to be processed.
- D. Calls are limited to specific programming languages.
- E. They make an application less portable, so asynchronous calls are preferred.

Answer: A,B

Explanation:

Synchronous calls to APIs are characterized by their blocking nature, meaning the process making the request must wait until it gets a reply before it can proceed with other tasks. This can add perceived latency to an application if there is a delay in receiving data.
