NEW QUESTION # 23

A system admin is looking to implement attribute-based access control (ABAC) in their Adobe Real-Time CDP (RTCDP) to support unique data access requirements for various user groups within the organization. Which method represents the most efficient way to set up ABAC in RTCDP?

- A. Distributing data in different databases based on the requirement of the user group
- B. Creating Individual policies for each user group
- C. Applying custom labels to data attributes and tying them to access groups with relevant policies
- D. Regularly updating user roles and permissions based on changing needs

Answer: C

Explanation:

The most efficient implementation of Attribute-Based Access Control (ABAC) in Adobe Real-Time CDP relies on the metadata-driven relationship between data labels and user permissions. Unlike traditional security models that only look at who the user is, ABAC looks at the attributes of the data itself to determine access.

The process begins by applying custom labels to specific XDM schema fields or attributes (Option D). For example, fields containing sensitive contact information can be labeled as "Protected." The admin then creates Access Groups and defines Policies that link these labels to specific roles. If a user belongs to a group that does not have the "Protected" permission, the system will automatically mask or hide those specific fields across the entire UI, including Profile views and Query Service results.

Option A is inefficient because it leads to "policy sprawl" and is difficult to maintain at scale. Option B is incorrect as AEP is a single, unified data store; you cannot "distribute" data into different databases to manage access. Option C describes a maintenance task for RBAC but does not address the foundational logic of ABAC. By tying labels to access groups, the admin creates a scalable, dynamic security model where access is automatically enforced based on the nature of the data being accessed.
