All three-Governance, Boundary, and Management-are defined as Information Baselines in MSP. An Information Baseline refers to essential information repositories and frameworks that support programme control and management.

The MSP Practitioner states: "All are defined information baselines," meaning that governance baselines set controls and accountability, boundary baselines define scope and limits, and management baselines cover operational details such as risks and issues.

Together, these baselines form a comprehensive information foundation, enabling effective oversight, coordination, and decision-making throughout the programme lifecycle.

Understanding and maintaining these baselines ensures transparency, consistency, and effective control over complex transformational programmes.

A key attribute for a Programme Manager is a good knowledge of project management approaches. This expertise enables the Programme Manager to oversee and coordinate multiple interrelated projects, ensuring they deliver outputs that collectively realize programme objectives.

The MSP Practitioner states: "Programme Manager should have good project management skills," emphasizing that while strategic leadership and stakeholder engagement are important, the ability to manage the complexities of project delivery is fundamental to the Programme Manager role.

While change management skills and access to key stakeholders are important complementary abilities, the core responsibility of managing project delivery across a dossier of projects necessitates strong project management knowledge.
