NEW QUESTION # 286

The Taylor Company makes products in Toronto and its base is moving toward full computer-assisted design (CAD) systems. Taylor is planning to implement a policy requiring product acceptance to be made from CAD drawings resident on the computer system. However, the Ward Company, an important customer of Taylor, has a written policy requiring suppliers to use paper drawings for product acceptance. Which of the following actions should Taylor take to be cost-effective and sensitive to Ward's requirement?

- A. Implement the CAD acceptance system and discuss with marketing how to change Ward's position.

- B. Implement a dual-design media acceptance system
- C. Delay implementing the CAD acceptance system until Ward changes its requirement
- D. Implement the CAD acceptance system and make exception for individual customer as needed

Answer: D

Explanation:

In situations where a company is transitioning to a new system that conflicts with the requirements of a key customer, it is often most cost-effective and customer-sensitive to implement the new system while making exceptions for customers as needed. This allows the company to move forward with its plans and modernize its processes while still accommodating important client relationships. In this case, Taylor Company can proceed with the CAD system, which represents the future direction of design and manufacturing, while respecting Ward Company's current policy by providing paper drawings for product acceptance.
