IAPP Certified Information Privacy Technologist (CIPT) Sample Questions (Q142-Q147):

NEW QUESTION # 142

Truncating the last octet of an IP address because it is NOT needed is an example of which privacy principle?

- A. Use Limitation
- B. Data Minimization
- C. Security Safeguards
- D. Purpose Limitation

Answer: B

Explanation:

truncating the last octet of an IP address because it is not needed is an example of data minimization. Data minimization is a privacy principle that involves collecting and processing only the minimum amount of personal data necessary for a specific purpose.

NEW QUESTION # 143

There are two groups of users. In a company, where one group is allowed to see credit card numbers, while the other group is not. Both are accessing the data through the same application. The most effective and efficient way to achieve this would be?

- A. Drop credit card numbers altogether whenever a user who does not have the right to see them accesses the data.
- B. Have two copies of the data, one copy where the credit card numbers are obfuscated, while the other copy has them in the clear. Serve up from the appropriate copy depending on the user accessing it.
- C. Obfuscate the credit card numbers whenever a user who does not have the right to see them accesses the data.
- D. Have the data encrypted at rest, and selectively decrypt it for the users who have the rights to see it.

Answer: C

Explanation:

The most effective and efficient way to handle different access levels to credit card numbers within the same application is to obfuscate the credit card numbers whenever a user who does not have the right to see them accesses the data. Option C ensures that sensitive information is masked for unauthorized users without the need for maintaining multiple data copies or complex encryption schemes. This approach aligns with data minimization and access control principles discussed in the IAPP's CIPT materials, which advocate for minimizing exposure of sensitive data.

NEW QUESTION # 144

What is the main function of a breach response center?

- A. Providing training to internal constituencies.
- B. Interfacing with privacy regulators and governmental bodies.
- C. Detecting internal security attacks.
- D. Addressing privacy incidents.

Answer: D

Explanation:

The main function of a breach response center is to address privacy incidents¹. A breach response center is a team of experts that conducts a comprehensive breach response when a data breach occurs¹. The breach response center may include forensics, legal, information security, information technology, operations, human resources, communications, investor relations, and management¹. The other options are not the main function of a breach response center, but rather possible tasks or roles that may be involved in a breach response.

NEW QUESTION # 145

What logs should an application server retain in order to prevent phishing attacks while minimizing data retention?

- A. Limited-retention logs including the identity of parties sending and receiving messages as well as metadata.
- B. Limited-retention logs including the links clicked in messages, the identity of parties sending and receiving them, as well as metadata.
- C. Limited-retention, de-identified logs including the links clicked in messages as well as metadata.
- D. Limited-retention, de-identified logs including only metadata.

Answer: C

NEW QUESTION # 146

Not updating software for a system that processes human resources data with the latest security patches may create what?

- A. Authentication issues.
- B. Reportable privacy violations.
- C. Privacy threat vectors.
