There are two record types, ABC and XYZ, with sync enabled. The XYZ record type is added as a relationship into the ABC record type.
A user has Viewer permission to the ABC record type but does not have access to the XYZ record type.
A site page is presented to the user where the data is sourced from the ABC record type and its related record type the XYZ reference.
What information does the user see on the site page?

- A. Page does not load and an error message is presented: "The record type [identifier=XYZ] does not exist, has been deleted, or you do not have sufficient privileges to access its data."
- B. Page is presented to the user and the data references to the XYZ record type appear as "null".
- C. Page is presented to the user with the XYZ record type data and fields references redacted.

Answer: A

Explanation:
Because the interface references fields on the XYZ record type, the user must have at least Viewer permission on XYZ as well as on ABC. Since the user lacks access to XYZ, the query cannot be executed and the page fails to load, displaying the error:
"The record type [identifier = XYZ] does not exist, has been deleted, or you do not have sufficient privileges to access its data."
