- A. Preventive and predictive controls
- B. Detective and Disguised controls
- C. Predictive and Detective controls
- D. Preventive and Detective controls

Answer: D

NEW QUESTION # 158

The cybersecurity response team at a global enterprise receives an alert from an employee regarding a suspicious email that appears to be from a senior executive. During the investigation, the team analyzes the email header and notices that the sending IP address originates from a foreign country that has no affiliation with the organization. A WHOIS lookup confirms that the IP is registered under an unknown entity. What key element helped identify the suspicious activity?

- A. DKIM verification
- B. Bounce-back analysis
- C. Originating IP trace
- D. Spam filter logs

Answer: C

Explanation:

The ECIH Email Security Incident Handling module emphasizes email header analysis as a primary method for identifying spoofed or malicious emails. One of the most critical header elements is the originating IP address, which reveals where the email actually came from.

Option D is correct because tracing the originating IP and validating it through WHOIS provided definitive evidence that the email did not originate from a legitimate organizational source. This technique allows responders to distinguish between legitimate executive communications and impersonation attempts.

Option A is reactive and unreliable. Option B provides detection context but not attribution. Option C validates domain authentication but does not always reveal spoofing when credentials are compromised.

ECIH highlights that IP tracing combined with WHOIS analysis is a powerful verification method during executive impersonation investigations, making Option D correct.
