2017 Z1 Question 1 a) State the three component parts of a floor. (3 marks)

(a) The actual loadbearing members;
(b) The upper surface or finish of the floor; and
(c) The lower surface of ceiling of the compartment below.

b) Describe one example where all three parts of a floor are separate and one example where all three parts are merged. (4 marks)

Example of separate Floor - all three parts are separate in a timber floor. In a small house the loadbearing members are the joists, the surface is the boarding and the ceiling is of plaster.

Example of merged Floor - A reinforced concrete floor in which all three parts, ceiling, floor surface and structure may be completely merged. The whole thickness of the concrete slab contributes to the strength of the floor and the upper and lower surfaces provide the floor and the ceiling.

c) i) Describe six different ways in which floor joists may be supported at the wall. (6 marks)

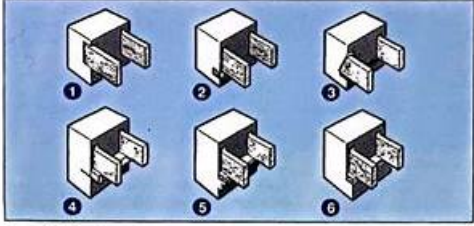

Figure 5.11 Sketches showing various arrangements for supporting floor joists: (1) joist with square end in pocket; (2) joist carried on wooden wall plate; (3) joist with splayed end in pocket; (4) joist carried on wooden wall plate carried on bracket; (5) joist carried on wooden wall plate on corbelled brickwork; (6) joist carried on wooden wall plate on a ledge formed by reducing the thickness of the wall.

Floor joists can be supported at the wall in several ways:

1. Simply built into the wall.
2. Supported on a wooden wall plate that the joist ends are nailed to.
3. Supported by a wrought steel wall plate built into the wall.
4. Supported by a wooden wall plate resting on wrought-iron brackets built into the wall.
5. Supported by a wooden wall plate on a ledge formed by corbelling the brickwork out from the wall.
6. Supported by a wooden wall plate on a ledge formed by reducing the wall thickness by 114mm at each floor level.

ii) Explain how any two of these ways would be expected to behave in a fire. (4 marks)

Joists simply built into the wall: If joists are simply built into the wall, there is a risk that their collapse during a fire could lever the wall off balance. This could also occur if joist pockets are not sufficiently large.

Steel joists/steelwork: Structural steelwork loses strength, buckles, and fails quickly when exposed to high temperatures in a fire, so it usually requires protection where fire resistance is needed. The expansion of steel joists due to fire can also exert lateral pressure on loadbearing walls, to which they are fixed. In steel filler joist and mass concrete floors, there is a danger that the concrete slabs could crack away from the steel in a fire, especially if the concrete is thin. Unprotected steelwork in roofs, particularly light sections, is vulnerable to fierce fire and can lead to rapid collapse.

iii) Describe three factors that can influence the fire resistance of timber floors (3 marks)

Three Factors Influencing the Fire Resistance of Timber Floors: The fire resistance of timber floors can be influenced by:

- (a) Type of flooring joists (plain edged, tongued & grooved, chipboard, plywood):
Tongued and grooved boards or continuous sheet materials (like plywood) help resist the spread of fire better than plain butted joists because they reduce gaps that flames and hot gases can penetrate.
- (b) Thickness of the flooring:
Thicker boards provide greater insulation against heat penetration, slowing down charring and extending the floor's fire resistance.
