A workshop that you coached resulted in some paper-based sketches and low-fidelity prototypes of a software application user interface. Why would you recommend the creation of mock-ups and visual simulations as a good way to drive the workshop results forward towards implementation? Note: There are 3 correct answers to this question.

- A. A mock up prevents non-participants from misinterpreting the results
- B. A mock up removes ambiguity and gives further security in terms of feasibility
- C. C, B, E
  Mock-ups and visual simulations are critical tools for advancing workshop results toward implementation. Here's why the correct answers are B, C, and E:
- D. A mock up transforms user stories into backlog items.
- E. A mock up further unleashes creativity through visualization.
- F. A mock up is a good way to manage "wild ideas" during prototyping
- G. A mock up transforms user stories into backlog itemsWhy this is incorrect:
  While mock-ups can inform backlog creation, their primary purpose is not to directly transform user stories into backlog items. This transformation typically occurs during the development phase, after the Design Thinking process.
