Salesforce Certified B2C Commerce Architect Sample Questions (Q28-Q33):

NEW QUESTION # 28

Northern Trail Outfitters uses an Order Management system (OMS), which creates an order tracking number for every order 24 hours after receiving it. The OMS provides only a web-service interface to get this tracking number. There is a job that updates this tracking number for exported orders, which were last modified yesterday.

Part of this job's code looks like the following:

Based on the above description and code snippet, which coding best practice should the Architect enforce?

- A. The transaction for updating of orders needs to be rewritten to avoid problems with transaction size.
- B. Configure circuit breaker and timeout for the OMS web service call to prevent thread exhaustion.
- C. Standard order import should be used instead of modifying multiple order objects with custom code.
- D. Post-processing of search results is a bad practice that needs to be corrected.

Answer: B

Explanation:

Given that the OMS provides a web-service interface and updates tracking numbers for orders modified the previous day, it is crucial to manage the potential risks of service unavailability or delays that could lead to thread exhaustion in Salesforce Commerce Cloud. Implementing a circuit breaker pattern helps to manage failures gracefully by halting the interaction with the OMS if it becomes unresponsive, thereby preventing the service from impacting the entire system. Additionally, configuring timeouts ensures that the service calls do not hold up resources indefinitely. These strategies help maintain system stability and responsiveness, particularly when dealing with external systems over which there may be limited control.
