If there's a major incident, then everybody stays quiet, and you refer to the public information officer or whoever is supposed to handle it; the CEO or whoever is going to be the person who can speak authoritatively to the news. So you need to make sure that you have the incident response capability, that you have a team that has the expertise to deal with this, and that you have procedures in place. The last thing you want to know is why you shut down the computer. Now all of the processes that we were running on it are off. They're gone, and we can't prove anything. Oh, well, I didn't want it to spread. No, if there's a major incident going on, isolate it; don't shut it down. We'll need to do some immediate live forensics here; unplug it from the network, sure, but don't just turn off the power. So you need to educate people in their whole classes, just from an IT perspective, on how to deal with this. As an IS auditor, we want to know: do they have these procedures in place for what they determined was adequate for them? Have they trained their people?

If we were to just go up and ask somebody, "Hey, if there was a major virus incident, what do you do?" Or, hey, if there was a major security breach and it showed up in the newspaper, what do you do? And so we need to know that they have incident response plans in place. They have trained people, they have procedures, and everybody knows, from the receptionist to the janitor to the CEO, what their role is in this and what they're supposed to do and not do. It's part of knowing that they did their due diligence. As a result, we must have incident response capability. We have to know that all business functions are covered, including the critical ones, and we have to know how to contain damage without damaging evidence. So these are all parts of the incident response capability. If this is a mom-and-pop donut shop, we probably don't care so much. We're worried about money being stolen out of the till or financial records, and maybe some private HR records. We probably don't mind talking to the news media about people's medical records or anything else. So, as part of your incident response process, you must ensure that you have something in place for all of these. And again, it depends on the organization. A large organisation had better have all of this.
