Answer: C,D

NEW QUESTION # 28

A Lead System Architect (LSA) team has a task to automate a design solution grading system.

Graders use the system to capture the score using a rubric (instructions) defined for the scenario. The rubric contain questions and statements against which the evaluation occurs.

The submitted design solution can fall into one of four categories: Excellent, Good, Not Bad, Bad. The score for each of these four categories varies between different versions of the instructions. For example, an Excellent score is anything above 75 in version 1.1. In version 1.2, a score above 65 is Excellent. Exam results are decided based on the average of the question scores. The result is either Pass, Fail, or Fix. For example, a total score between 60 and 75 is considered Fix.

The results range is version-dependent. Now, there is a debate within the team as to what data types the team should create.

Which one of the following options is the best data model design and implementation approach for this requirement?

- A. QuestionsList, ResponseCategory, CategoryRange, and ResultList.
- B. QuestionCategory, CategoryRange, and ResponseCategory.
- C. Rubric, Question, Response, CategoryRange, and ResultRange.
- D. RubricQuestions, ResponseRange, CategoryRange, and ResultRange.

Answer: C

NEW QUESTION # 29

What are two scenarios that you take into consideration when designing subcases? (Choose Two)

- A. When multiple units of work must be completed simultaneously and independently.
- B. When optimistic locking is required.
- C. To simplify reporting, security, and auditing.
- D. When parallel processing of cases is optional.

Answer: A,C

NEW QUESTION # 30

The Lead System Architect (LSA) team works on a Pega Platform implementation for a global car manufacturing company. The same models are available in all regions. However, the specifications change between countries. For example, emissions standards are different. Customers can contact a global customer service representative (CSR) for details about the vehicle specifications in their region.

The CSRs capture details from the customers about the model they are interested in and the country in which they live.

To compare the differences in the vehicle specifications for their country, the customers can input different model numbers.

However, their country remains constant. The company updates the vehicle details only once a year. The LSA team is tasked with creating a best-performing screen to display the specifications of the selected vehicle models.

Which of the following design approaches is best to implement the requirements?

- A. Design a data page with country as a parameter and use model as a key in keyed page access. Every change in the model input reloads the page from the clipboard. If the country input is new, then retrieve the data from the database.
- B. Design a data page to load asynchronously with all models and country as parameters. Every change in the model or country input reloads the page from the clipboard and avoids the trip to the database.
- C. Design a data page to load once each interaction, with model and country as parameters. Every change in the model or country input reloads the page from the clipboard and avoids the trip to the database.
- D. Design a data page with models and country as parameters. Every change in the input combination will create a page on the clipboard. If the same set of inputs repeats, then the system reloads the page from the clipboard and avoids a trip to the database.

Answer: A
