NEW QUESTION # 57

During planning for the next iteration, an agile team identifies most of the story points that are expected to be delivered. How should an agile practitioner work with the team to help identify the iteration's remaining scope?

- A. Convince the team to stop planning and keep the size small
- B. Identify the technically minimal and achievable tasks
- C. Select some of the smallest items from the backlog
- D. Refer to the remaining prioritized backlog items

Answer: D

Explanation:

The correct answer is C - Refer to the remaining prioritized backlog items. Agile planning is iterative and based on the product backlog's prioritization. During iteration planning, once the team has identified most story points to be delivered, it should refer back to the product backlog and select the next highest-priority user stories to fill in the remaining capacity, considering the team's historical velocity.

From the PMI Agile Practice Guide:

"Iteration planning begins with the team reviewing the prioritized backlog items. Based on their velocity, they determine how many stories can be completed. Teams select stories from the top of the backlog and stop when they reach their capacity." (PMI Agile Practice Guide, Section 5.2 - Iteration Planning) Mike Griffiths also emphasizes:

"Agile teams rely on a prioritized backlog maintained by the product owner. Iteration planning involves pulling the highest-priority stories into the sprint until the team reaches its forecasted velocity." (Mike Griffiths, PMI-ACP Exam Prep, Chapter 5 - Adaptive Planning) Other options are incorrect:

- * A is counter to adaptive planning and proactive engagement.
- * B focuses on technical feasibility, not business priority.
- * D ignores prioritization and may add low-value work.
