- A. If it is a consulting engagement accept the assignment because direct knowledge of the existing accounts payable processes will provide depth and add more value
- B. If it is a consulting engagement decline the assignment and ask to be reassigned, because in a consulting engagement the auditor must not assess operations for areas in which they were previously responsible
- C. If it is an assurance engagement accept the assignment because the chief audit executive had knowledge of the internal auditor's previous role when this engagement was assigned
- D. If it is an assurance engagement accept the assignment because direct knowledge of the existing accounts payable processes will provide depth and add more value

Answer: B

Explanation:

If it is a consulting engagement, the best action for the new internal auditor, who has recently transferred from being an accounts payable clerk, is to decline the assignment and ask to be reassigned. - A. Factitious vendors are entered into the system, possibly resulting in improper disbursements.
- B. A related party receives benefits not appropriate in an arm's-length transaction.
- C. Bad debt expense is intentionally omitted from the financial statements.
- D. Certain costs are capitalized, rather than expensed.

Answer: A

Explanation:

In the accounts payable function, the most likely fraud scenario involves the creation of fictitious vendors.

This fraud can lead to improper disbursements where payments are made to non-existent entities, effectively siphoning money out of the organization. This type of fraud is easier to execute in accounts payable compared to other functions because it can involve relatively straightforward manipulations of vendor master files and payment processes. Such schemes can result in significant financial losses and are a common concern for internal auditors reviewing accounts payable controls.
