NEW QUESTION # 224

What is the importance of gaining subordinate buy-in when setting the direction for an organization?

- A. To help subordinate units understand and define ways to contribute to the organization's success, reducing the risk of strategic misalignment and engagement decay
- B. To determine the organization's expansion and growth plans without internal conflict
- C. To establish the organization's brand identity and image without conflict
- D. To ensure that the organization has sufficient staff to take on defined tasks

Answer: A

Explanation:

Gaining subordinate buy-in is critical to ensure organizational alignment, effective execution, and long-term success. Without buy-in, there is a risk of disengagement and misalignment, which can undermine strategic objectives.

Importance of Buy-In:

Understanding and Contribution: Subordinate units need to understand how their actions contribute to organizational success.

Strategic Alignment: Helps ensure that all units are aligned with the organization's goals and priorities.

Engagement: Increases employee commitment and reduces the risk of disengagement or "engagement decay." Why Option D is Correct:

Option D captures the importance of ensuring that subordinates understand their role and remain aligned and engaged.

Options A and B are unrelated to subordinate buy-in and focus on external aspects like growth or branding.

Option C (staffing) is a logistical concern and not directly related to the concept of buy-in.

Relevant Frameworks and Guidelines:

OCEG Principled Performance Framework: Recommends fostering engagement and alignment to support principled performance.

ISO 30414 (Human Capital Reporting): Encourages employee engagement and alignment as part of workforce planning.

In summary, gaining subordinate buy-in helps subordinate units understand their contributions, align with strategic goals, and maintain engagement, reducing the risk of misalignment and disengagement.
