NEW QUESTION # 60

The Lead System Architect (LSA) team works on a Pega Platform implementation for a global car manufacturing company. The same models are available in all regions. However, the specifications change between countries. For example, emissions standards are different. Customers can contact a global customer service representative (CSR) for details about the vehicle specifications in their region.

The CSRs capture details from the customers about the model they are interested in and the country in which they live.

To compare the differences in the vehicle specifications for their country, the customers can input different model numbers.

However, their country remains constant. The company updates the vehicle details only once a year. The LSA team is tasked with creating a best-performing screen to display the specifications of the selected vehicle models.

Which of the following design approaches is best to implement the requirements?

- A. Design a data page with country as a parameter and use model as a key in keyed page access. Every change in the model input reloads the page from the clipboard. If the country input is new, then retrieve the data from the database.
- B. Design a data page to load once each interaction, with model and country as parameters. Every change in the model or country input reloads the page from the clipboard and avoids the trip to the database.
- C. Design a data page to load asynchronously with all models and country as parameters. Every change in the model or country input reloads the page from the clipboard and avoids the trip to the database.
- D. Design a data page with models and country as parameters. Every change in the input combination will create a page on the clipboard. If the same set of inputs repeats, then the system reloads the page from the clipboard and avoids a trip to the database.
